Impeachment tribunal could have saved time with pre-trial

LETTERS

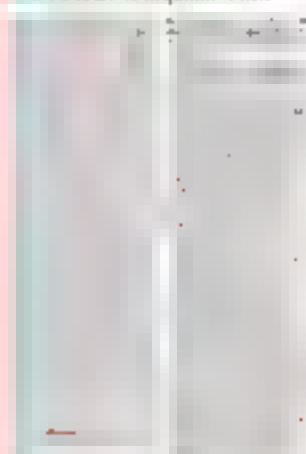

THE IMPROVISED, hastily assembled impeachment tribunal that tried and convicted the former president of Liberia, Charles Taylor, has been widely criticized for its lack of due process and its failure to follow basic legal principles. The tribunal's proceedings were marred by a lack of transparency, a biased composition, and a rushed trial that did not allow for a proper defense. The use of a pre-trial process could have saved time and ensured a more fair and thorough trial.

Charles Taylor, former president of Liberia, is seen in a courtroom.

A question of judicial privilege

By Staff Writer

The question of judicial privilege is a complex one. It involves the balance between the need for judges to be free from external pressures and the need for them to be accountable to the public.

One of the main arguments in favor of judicial privilege is that it allows judges to make decisions based on the law, without being influenced by political or other considerations.

Another argument is that judicial privilege is necessary to protect the integrity of the judiciary. If judges were subject to external pressures, they might be forced to make decisions that are not in the best interests of the law.

However, there are also arguments against judicial privilege. Some people believe that judges should be accountable to the public, just like other government officials.

One of the main arguments against judicial privilege is that it can lead to a lack of transparency. If judges are not accountable to the public, they might be able to hide their decisions from scrutiny.

Another argument is that judicial privilege can lead to a lack of confidence in the judiciary. If the public believes that judges are not accountable, they might lose faith in the legal system.

It is clear that the question of judicial privilege is a complex one. It involves many different factors, and there is no simple answer. However, it is important to continue to discuss this issue, as it is one of the most important in the legal system.
